When she was just 16 years old, she joined the local flying club and began taking lessons. She quickly showed a natural talent for flying, and within a year, she had earned her pilot's license.

In 1939, the Second World War broke out, and Eileen was eager to do her part. She joined the Royal Air Force (RAF) and was assigned to the Air Transport Auxiliary (ATA). The ATA was a civilian organization that ferried aircraft from factories to RAF bases. It was a dangerous job, and many pilots were killed or injured. But Eileen was undeterred. She flew countless missions, often in bad weather and under enemy fire.

In 1941, Eileen was selected to fly the Spitfire, one of the most iconic fighter aircraft of the war. She was one of the first women to fly the Spitfire, and she quickly became known as "the Spitfire girl." Eileen flew many combat missions in the Spitfire, and she even shot down an enemy aircraft. She was a skilled and courageous pilot, and she was an inspiration to her fellow pilots.

After the war, Eileen continued to fly. She became a commercial pilot and flew for several airlines. She also wrote several books about her experiences as a pilot.
